

NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS

Josefina Rodríguez-Arribas is a Researcher at the Warburg Institute (University of London). She has a PhD in Hebrew language and literature and has published a book (El cielo de Sefarad: los judíos y los astros, 2011) and several chapters and articles on medieval astronomy, astrology, and technical terminology in Hebrew and their sources in Greek, Latin, and Arabic literatures. She has also contributed with several entries to the Encyclopedia of Jews in the Islamic World (2010). She is currently working on the cultural role of the astrolabe in Jewish culture (11th–16th centuries) and finishing a book on the emergence and constitution of the astronomical terminology in medieval Hebrew (11th–12th centuries).
rodriguezarribas@gmail.com

Marinus Anthony van der Sluijs is an independent researcher and writer, and a Consulting Scholar at the University of Pennsylvania Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology, Philadelphia. He received a Master's Degree in Comparative and Historical Linguistics at Leiden University, The Netherlands (1999), specialising in the Indo-European and Semitic language families. Since then, he has published in the fields of comparative mythology, cultural astronomy, archaeoastronomy and the history of astronomy, religions and art. He is currently completing a 'Motif-index' of global themes in traditional cosmologies, demonstrating the internal consistency between such themes.
mythopedia@gmail.com

Andrew Vladimirov is a Greek Cypriot who was born in London. He completed his PhD on Byzantine Astrology at the University of Birmingham in Dec. 2006. He studied astrology with Michael Edwards from 1986 onwards and continues to gain inspiration, both private and educational, from his teacher and friend. He went to Manchester University as a mature student where he completed a B.A. in Comparative Religion, 1992–1995. This was followed by a MA in Late Antique and Byzantine Studies at King's College, London, 1995–1996. Aside from his Cypriot heritage, further inspiration and encouragement in his academic work has been provided by Ken Parry and Charles Burnett. He is currently researching a number of articles for publication.
avladimirov@yahoo.co.uk